Belief in the Part One is Playing

When an individual plays a part he implicitly requests his observers to take seriously the impression that is fostered before them. They are asked to believe that the character they see actually possesses the attributes he appears to possess, that the task he performs will have the consequences that are implicitly claimed for it, and that, in general, matters are what they appear to be. In line with this, there is the popular view that the individual offers his performance and puts on his show "for the benefit of other people." It will be convenient to begin a consideration of performances by turning the question around and looking at the individual's own belief in the impression of reality that he attempts to engender in those among whom he finds himself. Belief in the Part One is Playing

When an individual plays a part he implicitly requests his observers to take seriously the impression that is fostered before them. They are asked to believe that the character they see actually possesses the attributes he appears to possess, that the task he performs will have the consequences that are implicitly claimed for it, and that, in general, matters are what they appear to be. In line with this, there is the popular view that the individual offers his performance and puts on his show “for the benefit of other people.” It will be convenient to begin a consideration of performances by turning the question around and looking at the individual’s own belief in the impression of reality that he attempts to engender in those among whom he finds himself.

At one extreme, one finds that the performer can be fully taken in by his own act; he can be sincerely convinced that the impression of reality which he stages is the real reality. When his audience is also convinced in this way about the show he puts on—and this seems to be the typical case—then for the moment at least, only the sociologist or the socially disgruntled will have any doubts about the “realness” of what is presented.

At the other extreme, we find that the performer may not be taken in at all by his own routine. This possibility is understandable, since no one is in quite as good an observational position to see through the act as the person who puts it on. Coupled with this, the performer may be moved to guide the conviction of his audience only as a means to other ends, having no ultimate concern in the conception that they have of him or of the situation. When the individual has no belief in his own act and no ultimate concern with the beliefs of his audience, we may call him cynical, reserving the term “sincere” for individuals who believe in the

AIMS AND OBJECTIVES

After reading this chapter you should be able to:

- Identify the main sources of European law which influence the English Legal System;
- Recognise how European Union law changed domestic law;
- Identify the processes by which the UK left the European Union;
- Understand the impact that Brexit has had and will have on the English Legal System;
- Recognise the difference between the European Union and the Council of Europe;
- Explain the difference between the Human Rights Act 1998 and the European Convention on Human Rights;
- Recognise the key sections of the Human Rights Act 1998 and how they operate in the English Legal System.

2.1 The English Legal System and international law

Throughout your time studying the English Legal System, it may be easy to think that the European Union and European Convention on Human Rights are the only sources of law outside of English law to have influenced it. Although both make explicit reference to 'Europe' in their names, strictly speaking they are both sources of international law, as both involve international agreements. Both areas of law have greatly influenced our legal system, but it would be a mistake to think that they are the only non-domestic sources to influence English law.

For the purposes of this chapter, we will examine how the UK is a party to international treaties relating to European human rights law, how the UK was a member of the EU, and the treaties which now exist between the UK and EU. When it was a member of the EU, the UK was obliged to incorporate into UK law the laws of the institutions established by the EU treaties. Now that the UK has left the EU, EU law continues to affect the UK, but in a much more diminished way than in the past. The European Convention on Human Rights is the work of the Council of Europe (not the EU) and is fundamental to the operation of UK law (not just English law) because of the Human Rights Act 1998. However, these treaties make up a tiny minority of the treaties that the UK has signed. As of 2021, the UK is a signatory to over 14,000 treaties, with countries all over the world, on a huge variety of topics from fishing to space to nuclear weapons.

Ministers acting for the Government negotiate treaties on behalf of the UK. Parliament does not negotiate treaties. Once the Government negotiates and signs a treaty, what are the next steps?

Classical sculpture is not more realistic or natural than its predecessors in any absolute sense; indeed, it is not clear what absolute realism or naturalism might be. It combines a new and in some ways more thoroughgoing notation of what we, today, are prepared to recognize as the real with an equally new distortion of it. The two

After reading this chapter you should be able to:

- Identify the main sources of European law which influence the English Legal System;
- Recognise how European Union law changed domestic law;
- Identify the processes by which the UK left the European Union;
- Understand the impact that Brexit has had and will have on the English Legal System;
- Recognise the difference between the European Union and the Council of Europe;
- Explain the difference between the Human Rights Act 1998 and the European Convention on Human Rights;
- Recognise the key sections of the Human Rights Act 1998 and how they operate in the English Legal System.

2.1 The English Legal System and international law

Throughout your time studying the English Legal System, it may be easy to think that the European Union and European Convention on Human Rights are the only sources of law outside of English law to have influenced it. Although both make explicit reference to 'Europe' in their names, strictly speaking they are both sources of international law, as both involve international agreements. Both areas of law have greatly influenced our legal system, but it would be a mistake to think that they are the only non-domestic sources to influence English law.

For the purposes of this chapter, we will examine how the UK is a party to international treaties relating to European human rights law, how the UK was a member of the EU, and the treaties which now exist between the UK and EU. When it was a member of the EU, the UK was obliged to incorporate into UK law the laws of the institutions established by the EU treaties. Now that the UK has left the EU, EU law continues to affect the UK, but in a much more diminished way than in the past. The European Convention on Human Rights is the work of the Council of Europe (not the EU) and is fundamental to the operation of UK law (not just English law) because of the Human Rights Act 1998. However, these treaties make up a tiny minority of the treaties that the UK has signed. As of 2021, the UK is a signatory to over 14,000 treaties, with countries all over the world, on a huge variety of topics from fishing to space to nuclear weapons.

Ministers acting for the Government negotiate treaties on behalf of the UK. Parliament does not negotiate treaties. Once the Government negotiates and signs a treaty, what are the next steps?

2.1.1 Dualism and monism

Different legal systems have different approaches to international law. In monist systems, national and international legal systems form a unity. This means that international law does not need to be translated into national law; it is

The screenshot shows a user interface for a digital library. On the left, there's a sidebar with the username 'sherman-labs' and a 'Currently Reading' section featuring 'The Presentation of Self in Everyday Life' by Erving Goffman. Below that is a 'Collections' section with 'All Books (3)'. The main area is titled 'My Bookshelf' and contains a list of three books under the heading 'All Books (3)'. The first book is 'The Presentation of Self in Everyday Life' by Erving Goffman, which is currently being read (1/226 pages, expires Nov 8, 2024). The second is 'Cloud Computing Basics' by Anders Lisdorf (1/198 pages, expires Nov 14, 2024). The third is 'Sustainability' by Paul B. Thompson and Patricia E. Norris (New, expires Nov 28, 2024). A red box highlights the three-dot menu for the first book, and a red arrow points to the 'Remove Download' option in the dropdown menu.

The screenshot shows a mobile application interface for a user named 'sherman-labs'. The main screen is titled 'My Bookshelf' and displays a list of books under the heading 'All Books (3)'. The books listed are:

- The Presentation of Self in Everyday Life by Erving Goffman (1/226 pages, expires November 8, 2024). Buttons: Book Details, Read.
- Cloud Computing Basics by Anders Lisdorf (1/198 pages, expires November 14, 2024). Buttons: Book Details, Read.
- Sustainable... by Paul... (expires November 28, 2024). Buttons: Book Details, Download.

A dialog box titled 'Remove Download' is overlaid on the screen, asking for confirmation to remove a download. The text in the dialog reads: 'Are you sure you want to remove this download from your device? This will free up space, but you will need to download this book again to continue reading.' At the bottom of the dialog are two buttons: 'Cancel' and 'Remove'.

On the left side of the app, there is a 'Currently Reading' section showing 'The Presentation of Self in Everyday Life' at 'Page 1 of 226', with an expiration time of 'Expires on Nov 8, 2024, 14:21' and a 'Continue Reading' button. Below that is a 'Collections' section with 'All Books (3)'.

At the bottom left of the app interface, there is a small icon of a document with a green checkmark.
